

🔔 When “Traditional Values” Are Labeled “Extremist” — A Warning for Our Civilization

A recent news report claimed that holding “traditional values” might be flagged as a sign of “extremism.”

Think about that: The same moral convictions that have shaped families, communities, and healthy civic life for centuries — faith, family, truth, and personal responsibility — are now suspect in some circles.

Let’s be clear: Violent extremism that threatens life and liberty must always be opposed. But redefining everyday moral beliefs as dangerous crosses a line — it erodes trust, divides communities, and gives the state power to police conscience.

🗨️ Here's the deeper truth:

Civilization can't stand on vague "values" alone. Traditions not rooted in something unchanging will drift and decay. From a Christian perspective, true moral order comes not from habit or nostalgia, but from the living Lordship of Jesus Christ. "In Him all things hold together." (Colossians 1:17)

Without Christ, a people may try to cling to "tradition," but they lose the life and truth that make it good and enduring. Isaiah's warning rings true: "Woe to those who call evil good and good evil..." (Isaiah 5:20)

Be vigilant when power redefines good and evil.

Defend freedom of conscience and belief.

Remember: Without Christ, our "values" are just words on paper — easily redefined, easily discarded.

A society that labels everyday righteousness "extreme" today will inevitably target its true source tomorrow. And that source is Christ.

"Righteousness exalts a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." — Proverbs 14:34

👉 How do we hold the line for truth and freedom in a world that calls good 'extreme'? I'd love to hear your thoughts.
