Why Satanic Churches Cannot — and Must Not — Exist
The case against legitimizing a contradiction

The phrase "satanic church" is a contradiction so severe it collapses under the weight of its own logic. It attempts to fuse darkness with light, destruction with creation, and rebellion with sacred order. No matter how society tries to redefine terms, one cannot redefine reality. A "church," by definition, is a gathering of worship, order, and reverence toward a higher good. Satanism is none of these things — and never will be.

1. A Church Requires Holiness — Satanism Has None

The word church originates from the Greek ekklesia, meaning a called-out assembly — historically and spiritually tied to the worship of God, the Creator, the source of life, love, and truth. A true church is a place of healing, teaching, and sanctification — built on submission to divine authority.

Satanism, whether theistic or symbolic, rejects that authority. It exalts pride, rebellion, and often nihilism. You can't call a gathering devoted to darkness a "church." That would be like calling a pit a temple or a curse a prayer. Words still matter.

2. The State Cannot Sanction What Destroys It

Governments were instituted to preserve order, secure rights, and promote the common good. These aims are not neutral — they're morally grounded. That's why laws protect the innocent, punish evil, and uphold justice. Granting satanic groups the same status as religious institutions equates moral truth with moral inversion.

Allowing satanic displays on statehouse grounds — where public virtue and law are upheld — is not neutrality. It's surrender. The state cannot survive while honoring forces that oppose its moral foundation.

3. Freedom of Religion Is Not Freedom from Reason

Religious freedom is essential — but even freedom has fences. We don't protect criminal cults or ideologies that call for societal collapse. Freedom of religion is not a blank check for mockery or moral subversion disguised as belief.

A "satanic church" isn't a faith seeking expression — it's a parody seeking attention. It offers no hope, transformation, or redemption — only confusion and moral erosion.

In Conclusion

The idea of a satanic church is not just offensive — it's metaphysically impossible. It's like trying to build a house on a foundation of fire. There is no truth, no love, no peace, and no salvation in Satan. And there is no such thing as a church without those things. That's why satanic churches do not exist in any true or eternal sense — and why no government, especially one that values liberty and truth, should ever treat them as though they do.

To those citing “separation of church and state” — that principle exists to prevent government tyranny over faith, not to protect mockery. The Constitution defends the free exercise of sincere religion — not the elevation of darkness in the name of equality.

Truth still matters. And truth doesn’t bow to contradiction.
